Stocks took another wrenching fall yesterday, virtually ensuring that the most spectacular bull market in stocks this century has given way to what will likely end up as one of the worst years in a generation.

Yesterday, the nine-month sell-off in technology stocks accelerated, sending the Nasdaq Composite Index on its latest historic slide, amid trading volume that neared record levels. The index, packed with tech stocks, slid more than 7%, the seventh-worst one-day percentage loss since Nasdaq's founding in 1971.

The tech-stock plummet continued a pull-back for the Nasdaq index—interspersed with fleeting rallies—that began after the index hit a record 5048.62 in March. The index, after yesterday's 178.93-point loss, now stands at 2332.78, its lowest level since March 1999.

The Nasdaq index is now 54% below the high point in March and 43% lower for the year, a capitulation that has some veteran investors turning to some of the stock market's worst periods for comparisons, including the Oct. 19, 1987, stock-market crash.

"It's not like October 1987, which happened all at once, but this isn't just a bear market, it's a crash for the Nasdaq, there's no other term," said money manager Scott Black, president of Delphi Management Inc. in Boston. "There's panic selling and I think there will be more bloodletting."

The overall stock market hasn't been pounded nearly as much as Nasdaq; still, the Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 2.51%, or 265.44 points, to 10318.93, a move that might have been noteworthy were it
